
Jonny Hewlett

Jonny Hewlett is CEO for Diesel, the Italian fashion giant, in Greater China.

Hewlett focuses on driving organisational change, integrating different cultures and re-applying proven approaches from other industries to achieve breakthrough results. Transitioning from the corporate FMCG world of Procter & Gamble to the fashion group Diesel has provided a broad spectrum of experience in areas such as leadership, change and trade customer management.

Hewlett began his career with Procter and Gamble. In 1997, he joined P&G's Fine Fragrance division (the combination of 2 acquired companies ; the German based Eurocos and the US based Giorgio Beverly Hills). His initial brief was to create a Global Trade Marketing department which merged 2 very disparate organisations both culturally and geographically. Following this, he was assigned to lead the acquisition of Jean Patou Parfums, a small French based fragrance manufacturer which was to result in making the Lacoste brand a truly global player for P&G Fragrances, as well as helping establish a P&G affiliate presence in France.

In 2002, he became Global Market Strategy and Planning Director for P&G Fragrances (now re-branded as P&G Prestige Products) and helped to build Lacoste and Hugo Boss into leading market positions across the world.

In 2008, after 16 years at P&G, Hewlett left the company to join Diesel, the Italian based fashion giant, to be the Managing Director for the UK and Ireland. Across the last 2 years, his challenges have been to turn the UK affiliate around in sales and profit, re-structure the wholesale team to drive key account management and joint business planning partnerships with all major customers, re-evaluate the UK retail strategy and drive organisational change to embrace career development and a coaching culture across the business.

"Jonny's insightful and forward-looking appraisal of Britain's retail landscape was delivered with passion at the John Lewis Senior Leadership Conference. Without doubt, his enthusiasm for 'big brand strategy' shone through".
