Enrique Penalosa is an internationally respected urban thinker, who, as Mayor of Bogota in two non-consecutive terms, profoundly transformed his city. As adviser and lecturer, he has influenced policies in many cities throughout the world.

As Mayor of Bogota Penalosa he changed the 8 million inhabitants capital of Colombia from one with neither bearings, nor self-esteem into an international model for improvements in mobility, quality of life and sustainability.

Among his achievements was the creation of TransMilenio, the world's best BRT (Bus based mass transit), which today moves 2,5 million passengers daily, inspired by the Curitiba model but much improved in capacity and speed, which has served as model to hundreds of cities. He also created an extensive bicycle network when only the northern European cities had one, greenways, hundreds of parks, formidable sports and cultural centers and large libraries, nearly a 100 schools, 35 of which managed by a successful private-public scheme and high quality urban development projects close to 500,000 people and a radical redevelopment of 33 hectares of the center of Bogota, previously controlled by drug dealers and crime which required demolishing more than 1200 buildings occupying 32 hectares, a few blocks from the heart of Colombia's institutional heart, including the Presidential house.

His advisory work concentrates on urban mobility, quality of life, competitiveness, equity and the leadership required to turn visions into realities.

Penalosa has lectured in hundreds of cities and in the world's most important universities. He has advised local and national governments in Asia, Africa, Australia, Latin America and the United States.
