We will spend 80000 hours at work. Yet most of us don't feel comfortable or equipped to start a conversation with our people about their career or their future. This gaping hole is the main reason talent leave good businesses.

What does the future world of work look like? How will our careers and working lives be transformed by the post-pandemic environment? What action do you need to take as a leader to ensure you win the war for talent and have a thriving working environment that is fit for the future?

The job for life is dead and we can work from anywhere, for anyone. What does this mean for people functions and business leaders?
